Elders of Trio, Chico Marx Dies

In movies like "A Night at the Opera" and "Animal Crackers," which helped establish the brothers as huge boxoffice stars, Chico had a busy hair and spoke with an Italian accent.

Offstage, however, he had no accent. His real name was Leonard. And he was the eldest of the comedy trio he formed with Groucho and Harpo.

Chico, a quiet man who remained close to his brothers through his life, was married nearly three years ago to Mary DIVithas. It was his second marriage. He met Mary 19 years ago when she was an MGM actress.

Chico, Groucho and Harpo made such famous comedy films as "The Coconuts," "Monkey Business," "Horse-Feathers," "Duck Soup" "A Day at the Races," "Room Service," "Go West" and "A Night in Gasablanca."

But when the team discontinued making movies and Groucho became a top television star, Chico faded into relative obscurity.

Born March 22, 1891, in New York City, Chico was one of five sons. The others were Harpo Arthur, Groucho Julius, Gummo Milton and Zeppo Herbert. They were given their unusual names by Art Fischer, a monologist, in Peoria, Ill. As the five boys grew up their mother dedicated her life to training them for the stage.

comes from sturdy stock." At her bedside when death came were her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Dorothy Moses, Dr. Shaw and a minister. Her death first was announced in New York City by her gallery, Gallerie St. Etienne.

Grandma Moses, whose real name, Anna Mary Robertson Moses, was not known to many of her millions of fans, reached 101 last Sept. 7. She was so sprightly then that she celebrated the day by dancing a jig with her doctor.

Grandma Moses, the nation's best known primitive artist, reproduced in oil paints the things she knew best: country life. Her many works showed most frequently such scenes as sleighing and su-yaring parties, farmhouses and barns and other familiar country subjects.

She had been confined to the Hoosick Falls nursing home since mid-summer as the result of a fall at her nearby Eagle Bridge, N.Y., home. She became ill at the end of this month. She contracted pneumonia, but rallied, then fell into a coma about 9 a.m. Death came at 3:15 p.m.

Her doctor, Dr. Clayton E. Shaw ascribed death to hardening of the arteries.

"I've known for several weeks, months," that she would die, Shaw said. "I've been expecting it almost daily, but she kept reviving. She
