Lucky Luciano Dies in Italy

NAPLES, Italy (UPI) —
Lucky Luciano died as he lived—watched by the police. There were no last words, no confidences, no statements from the ex-gangster who amassed a fortune from prostitution and dope pushing.

His luck ran out at 5:25 p.m. Friday in the Naples airport when he clutched his chest, dropped to the marble floor and died of an apparent heart attack. Dr. Alonso Zarone performed an autopsy Saturday to make sure but did not announce his findings immediately.

The man who was with him at the last was Martin Gosch who identified himself as a film producer and said the 65-year-old Charles Lucky Luciano met him at the airport to discuss a film about Luciano's life.

Gosch told a news conference Saturday that Luciano not only was being watched by police but that one of them, Marcelo Resta, went to the airport with him.

Gosch said Luciano identified Resta "as a friend of his because Luciano felt badly and did not want me to feel uncomfortable, knowing that the other man was a policeman."

Luciano Funeral Deluxe

NAPLES, Italy (UPI) — Charles Lucky Luciano, the immigrant who grew up to rule New York's gangster world of prostitution and narcotics, was said to rest Monday in a cemetery chapel but only temporarily.

The nameless men of the underworld, so furtive they hid their names and faces from the public, gave Luciano a super-deluxe funeral, including a Requiem Mass, and the biggest hearse in Naples drawn by eight coal black horses.

One of the mourners was a Neapolitan beauty who said she was his widow.

The squadrons of police and American and Italian narcotics agents who thronged St. Joachim Roman Catholic Church outnumbered the hard-faced mourners who ducked behind their hats each time a flashbulb popped.

When asked who some of the mourners were a U. S. police official said: "You can't tell them without a scorecard. But I'm sure that when the films are developed they will come in very useful, if not now, in the future."

Luciano was buried in the English cemetery in Naples. His brother, Batolo Lucania, 72, and a nephew, Salvatore Lucania, hoped to get permission to take the body to New York later and place it in the family plot in a New York cemetery. His fondest hope was to return to the United States from which he was expelled 16 years ago as an undesirable alien.
