Lack of oxygen caused the death of a construction worker. June 24, 1961, a construction worker was lowered into a manhole on Macarthurt. When he passed out while being lowered into the manhole, there was no oxygen present. The Department revealed there was no oxygen present.

From an article reports, the Department was not providing enough safety features for Castillo when he went into the hole. Castillo went down. An earlier test by the water department showed that there was still air in the 17-foot-deep manhole. When he lost consciousness and dropped head first into the hole, he swung upside down to check the water main. When he lost air, his employer, said his breathing was barely audible.

However, William Chapman, president of DB Services, said that before the manhole cover was removed, a worker went into the manhole. He was breathing low, and dropped head first into the hole. When he lost consciousness, he swung upside down to check the water main. When he lost air, his employer, said his breathing was barely audible.
