Work deaths bring fine, one appeal

By DEENA GRAVES
News Staff Writer

One company paid a fine and another filed an appeal in unrelated cases brought against them by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration after two employees were killed on the job in Irving, officials said.

Seyforth Roofing Co. was cited for violation of standards for working on roofs that have several layers, officials said.

The Garland-based roofing company contested the charge, and the case now will be litigated, said Clyde Payne, acting area director for OSHA.

An OSHA review committee will hear the case, which could take some time to resolve, Payne said. OSHA refused to release the nature of the violation until a settlement is reached.

On Nov. 6, the company's worker, 23-year-old Michael Duane Moore of Garland, was measuring the roof of The Courtyard building, 1320 Greenway Drive, when he misjudged the distance of an inset and stepped off the roof backward, falling 136 feet to the concrete below, police said.

A spokeswoman for the company said company officials feel that the company was cited unfairly, but she refused to comment further.

In an unrelated case, OSHA cited Flag Repairs by Lee and Co. for improper safety measures, Payne said.

Eddie Preston Owens, an employee of the DeSoto-based company, died Nov. 16 after he touched a metal flagpole to a power line and fell 20 feet to the street below, authorities said.

OSHA cited the company because metal ladders were being used where they could come into contact with electricity, Payne said.

The company paid a $200 fine, and two employees were killed on the job in Irving, officials said.
